

To whom it may concern at the FCC:

I used to be under the impression that the American airwaves were a place of equal opportunity and that they were the property of the American citizenry. In the past few years, I have been proven horribly wrong. As more and more media conglomerates join together to disrupt the fairness of our so-called "public" airwaves, Americans are given fewer choices and opinions. Now it seems that the worst possible result of this media takeover may soon be allowed to occur. The attempt by the Sinclair broadcasting group to force its stations to air "Stolen Honor", the obviously biased and questionably slanderous "documentary" regarding John Kerry only weeks before the Presidential election proves to America once and for all that major media outlets can no longer be trusted for impartial and factual information.

Several months ago, when a pop music star committed an indecent act on national television, the FCC was quick to respond and tighten regulations regarding indecent activity on public airwaves. Should not the improper and unethical use of our public media by Sinclair Broadcasting be held to just as high a standard? I implore the FCC to take whatever steps it can to protect our nation from this ridiculous act of corporate influence. Our nation will face enough problems in the weeks to come as we make a difficult choice, and we certainly should not have to deal with something as outrageous and unfair as this company's deplorable use of power and influence to change the outcome of so important and serious a process.
